

In the past we used to call a list of resources a “bibliography.” But the MLA Handbook doesn’t use that term any more. Why? “Biblio” means “book” and “graph” means “to write,” so a bibliography is a written list of the books used. But we now use many more types of resources—far more than just books. So now we call it a “List of Works” instead of a bibliography.

In the body of your presentation you should cite resources from your list of works. That’s how you give credit for quotations or ideas that you found in your research and used in your presentation. (Basically, you put author of the source along with the page number, if available, in parentheses next to a quotation or next to any place you used an idea from a source—see “How to Cite a Resource.”)

If you cited each work in your list of works within the body of your presentation, then you would call your list of works a “List of Works Cited.” However, chances are that you will research more material than you will use directly in preparing your presentation. You will gain valuable background information from many sources, but you will not necessarily find a “gem” in each resource that you feel you need to include directly in your presentation. Therefore, you may not cite each source. In that case, you will call your list a “List of Works Consulted.”
